Paid plans start at $0.99/month for 50GB of iCloud storage. Best traditional Mac note-taking app OneNote (macOS, Windows, iOS, Android, Web) OneNote first came out in 2003, making it by far the oldest app on this list. Bear Price: Free with limitations; $1.49/month for Bear Pro. The most powerful notes app for Mac Obsidian (macOS, Windows, Android, iOS) Obsidian is the first app I've come across that quotes John Locke in its help document. Hashtags show up in the left panel and can be arranged alphabetically, by last-used hashtag, or by popularity. Bonus points if there are tools for quickly clipping information from websites or pushing text over from other apps. Organize your notes. Joplin is a free and open-source application, which among other things means that all of your notes live on your computer under your control. You're going to take a lot of notes—you need to be able to find the right ones quickly. Are easy to use. I don't say this to put Apple Notes down—it's a very effective tool. For example, you could automatically make new notes for all Google Calendar appointments so you're ready to go when the meeting starts, or you could automatically migrate notes from other apps. Copy new Evernote notes to your OneNote notebook Create OneNote notes from new or moved Trello cards Try out OneNote if Apple Notes doesn't give you quite as much freedom as you'd like. This means if you stop using Obsidian, you can keep all of your notes. It might fit you perfectly, or you might learn which missing features matter most. If you like Apple Notes but wish it had just a few more features, Bear is what you want to check out first. There are also add-ons for things like end-to-end encryption and version history ($8) or the ability to publish notes and access to graph views and outlines ($16). The best open-source Mac note-taking app Joplin (macOS, Windows, Linux, Android, iOS) Notes are intensely personal, and I understand if you don't want to trust them all to a company that has its own agenda. Automate your note-taking Keyboard shortcuts, notifications, and user interfaces that don't fit in can be distracting, which is the last thing you want to be thinking about when it's time to take notes. I've been writing about macOS for over a decade, and I'm passionate about finding the best Mac apps. No other app on this list offers that. The core metaphor is that of a paper notebook, and it shows. It's almost like a personal wiki, but better. This sounds strange, but starting using it, and the concept makes a lot of sense, quickly. OneNote is your best bet for an Evernote alternative for Mac. The best Apple Notes alternative Bear (macOS, iOS) I'm just going to come out and say it: Bear is really pretty. The main editor is in Markdown, but there's an optional rich text editor if you're not comfortable with that. But the real power comes from the community plugins, which let you add features like a calendar for daily journal entries or a full-blown kanban board. Obsidian pricing: Free for most features; from $25 for exclusive features. It should take moments to open the app and start writing. But it's great for keeping track of what you're working on right now, and for quickly writing something down. You can make it work exactly the way you want to. You might find the interface a little cluttered, but the flexibility is well worth the tradeoff. Microsoft OneNote pricing: Free with 5G of OneDrive storage. So if you ever use Windows or Android, it's a great choice. I've got to say: it's my kind of crazy. Obsidian's notes are literally just text documents, formatted using Markdown. You can also clip articles and recipes from the web using the OneNote clipper for your browser. OneNote syncs to every kind of device you can imagine, well outside the ecosystem. There's even optical character recognition (OCR), meaning if you attach an image or PDF, your search applies to the contents of those files. That's why we're not including Evernote in this specific list, even if we still think it's one of the best overall note-taking apps. Typically this means a primary window you can use to browse all of your notes, sorted into notebooks and usually arranged by dates. But that's the bare minimum. There are plenty of good note-taking apps for Mac, so give these ones a whirl and see which one feels the most at home on your Mac. This article was originally published in March 2019 by Tim Brooks. One of them is right for you. Best simple Mac note-taking app Apple Notes (macOS, iOS, web) There's a saying in photography: the best camera is the one you have with you. Microsoft 365 starts at $9.99/month and includes Word, Excel, PowerPoint, OneNote, Outlook, and 6TB of OneDrive storage. OneNote's closest rival was, for a long time, Evernote. Most apps in this list work like a text editor, but OneNote is more like a piece of paper: you can click anywhere to start typing in that exact spot. Productivity apps that don't fit your workflow can trip you up, which is why finding an actual Mac note-taking app matters. There should be ways to sort things: folders, tags, and/or notebooks. Offer fast and useful search. If you're looking for a notes app for the Apple operating system, try Apple Notes first. This is a native Mac app, after all, so you don't have to wait for an upload before things show up. Notes are organized into notebooks and arranged by date. This creates a web of knowledge you can easily browse, and there's also a quick keyboard shortcut for pulling up notes by name or contents. We spend dozens of hours researching and testing apps, using each app as it's intended to be used and evaluating it against the criteria we set for the category. There's no tagging and no universal search, which means this isn't going to become a database of your life anytime soon. The best apps are designed with the user in mind and are easy to navigate for the beginner. You can drag images to your notes, and they will show up instantly, and there's also support for embedding audio files. I considered 20 note apps for Mac, and after extensive testing, this article includes the best of the best. The 5 best note-taking apps for Mac What makes a great note-taking app for Mac? All of our best apps roundups are written by humans who've spent much of their careers using, testing, and writing about software. It's clearly designed with aesthetics in mind, and it's going to appeal to a lot of Mac users for this reason exactly. For example, you could create a main #personal hashtag, and then use child tags like #personal/receipts and #personal/vacation for deeper organization. It takes some getting used to, but it's comfortable once you do. For more details on our process, read the full rundown of how we select apps to feature on the Zapier blog. You can take notes using just about any app, or a piece of paper for that matter. A core idea here is that you will create new notes frequently, then link back to them in other documents. Either way, it's a win. Apple Notes pricing: Free with 5GB of iCloud storage. You can also attach any document to a note, if you want, and it all happens very quickly. You don't need an account to get started, and you can sync your notes between devices using any service you want: Dropbox, OneDrive, or the open-source Nextcloud are all supported, and you can enable end-to-end encryption if you don't want third-party services to have access. The interface is that of a traditional note-taking app, with notebooks and notes organized in the left column. It's also really fast, as a fully native app. What's here that isn't in Apple Notes? We're never paid for placement in our articles from any app or for links to any site—we value the trust readers put in us to offer authentic evaluations of the categories and apps we review. The most recent review of apps was in July 2021 and it has since been updated for clarity. A recent update means the Mac app is essentially the web version of Evernote in a window. But the fact that you don't need to install it, pay for it, or create a new account to get started is, for most Mac users, more than enough of a reason to try Apple Notes first. This app loads instantly, and creating a new note couldn't be faster. There are plenty of great note-taking apps, but not all of them run well on a Mac. I recommend it if you're looking for a OneNote alternative and want full control over your notes. Joplin pricing: Free What's the best note-taking app for Mac? The best notes app is the one you like the most—but not all notes apps play nice on Mac. For the purposes of this article, though, we only considered apps built with note-taking in mind. That alone speaks to how ambitious this app is: it wants to change the way you think. Notes are organized in multiple notebooks, which are divided into sections. Everything about the interface is customizable, and you can have multiple notes open in the same window. But don't let the simplicity of the file format fool you—Obsidian aims to be a database of your life. The app offers all kinds of structure, giving you a sidebar full of folders you can use to organize in but also emphasizing internal hyperlinks. Child tags can be created with a slash. Power users matter too, though, which is why features like keyboard shortcuts and flexible preferences also matter. Are an actual native Mac app. You can make OneNote even more powerful using Zapier's OneNote integration, which connects OneNote with thousands of other apps. There's also support for opening notes in external apps, so if you've got a favorite Markdown editor, you can use that instead. It's the most robust open-source option we found, and there's support for importing notebooks from Evernote. In our opinion, the best Mac note-taking apps: Make it quick to add new notes. To be on this list, it's not enough to put the web version of your application in a window and call it a day. All of the note-taking apps for Mac below meet all of these criteria—and excel at many of them. You can also organize notes using tags, and you can clip articles from the web using the web clipper. If you have a Mac, you have Apple Notes, and that alone makes it the best note-taking app for many people. This is a structure many other apps would go on to copy, but in many ways OneNote still does it best—all while offering a significantly more generous free option than you can find anywhere else. OneNote is particularly easy to recommend to Microsoft Office users, who will immediately find the user interface familiar, but it works for everyone. There's optional support for writing in Markdown, if you're into that sort of thing. There's also support for drawing, though this is probably easier to use on a tablet than a Mac, and images and documents can be added inline or as attachments. And the search is very complete, giving you a way to find notes across every one of your notebooks. There's also support for exporting your notes to other formats, including PDF, HTML, DOCX, and even JPG files. Organization is a bit different too: it's done through hashtags, which can be added to the note itself, just like on Twitter. What makes a Mac notes app truly great? Well, you can use the Bear browser extensions to clip entire articles you find on the web.
